A word from the local organiser

Interview with ECPR General Conference 2019 Local Organiser – Piotr Sula

When was your first experience of the ECPR General Conference?

I had a very limited experience with the ECPR General Conference before we organised it. I participated only twice. Obviously, I was aware of the fact that these conferences attracting huge number of scholars from all over the world were excellent fora for exchanging ideas and networking.

What interested you in hosting the Conference?

My intention was to encourage the community of the Institute of Political Science to join different activities of the ECPR. Now, I may say it worked.

Obviously, I was aware of the fact that these conferences attracting huge number of scholars from all over the world were excellent fora for exchanging ideas and networking.

Was the experience what you had expected it to be?

Yes, definitely. Many colleagues and PhD candidates from my institute had the opportunity to present their papers and get involved in discussions. I am certain this experience would inspire us to further scientific efforts. Regarding my personal experience, I hoped to benefit from participating in panels and roundtables but it turned out it was impossible to combine the role of an organiser and a conference participant.

What did you enjoy most about organising the event?

Finis coronat opus/the end crowns the work. Most satisfying was the genuine satisfaction of the participants I met. I did enjoy also the enthusiasm of people with whom I had a pleasure to cooperate while organising the conference.

What advice can you offer future hosts?

I would suggest that future hosts are optimists. There might be plenty of problems on the way to a spectacular end, but coping with them requires patience and conviction that all of them might be overcome with the help of the ECPR staff, the colleagues from your institution and administrative staff of your university. Do not hesitate to knock on different doors asking for help because this event is beneficial for your city.

Best international conference I attended so far.

Great opportunity to see what other researchers are currently doing and how political science is evolving.
